

J. H. SCHARF PROPERTY

It is believed that part of this building was built in the third quarter of the 19th century but was then altered early in this century to form its present L-shape. The structure has been further altered for commercial use in modern times; however, the frame and clapboard exterior still exhibits certain Victorian qualities. Among these are a swell front and gingerbread in the west gable.

Along with several of its neighbors, this building plays a great role in maintaining Delaware Avenue as one of the last streets in the heart of Towson with a 19th century appearance.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The 1877 Hopkins atlas shows two long rectangular buildings on the parcel of ground adjoining the Parsonage on the south, and they are listed as belonging to J. H. Scharf. The same information appears on Bromley's atlas of 1898 where they are color-coded for frame construction. In Bromley's 1915 atlas, however, the parcel has been subdivided and the present L-shaped building appears next to the Parsonage.

The present structure has been modified in modern times by an addition which extends it to the east almost 20 feet and its large porch was enclosed achieving greater interior space. The original structure measured 43 feet on its north side and 27 feet on its east side. The indentation of the L-shape contained the porch which was 22 feet long and feet wide.

The house is a full two stories and is of frame construction resting on a stone foundation. The cellar has been altered to be a full basement under the entire building; however, the original appears to have a half cellar that had 6-foot stone walls but was only 10 x 12 feet in length and width. It appears to have been entered by an exterior entrance on the east side.

The commercial use to which the building has been put in modern times has necessitated many alterations; however, the exterior still contains much evidence of the original Victorian appearance. The west gable still contains gingerbread scrollwork in the eaves and the attic is lighted by an arched window. The Victorian concern for light is in evidence by the swell-front or two-story bay window that once lighted the south rooms, in the east wing. It is bisected by the roof of the porch. These windows are closed in today and the other windows have been altered, but it is supposed that they may have been the tall 2/2 variety common to the period.

Examination of the interior revealed little except for vertically-sawn joists and rafters, and the use of cut nails. Cut nails were also observed in the clapboards on the exterior of the south facade.

Note: It is possible that the southernmost of the two longitudinal buildings which appear in the 1877 Atlas was moved to the adjacent lot and attached to its neighbor at a 90° angle.
